Q36. Currently, one of the few places aspiring doctors and scientists can get loans for their graduate school program is through the federal government. These loans are typically repaid at a higher rate than undergraduate loans because of these student' s earning potential upon graduation. Now I want to give you some arguments from supporters and opponents of these various plans. After hearing each set of arguments, tell me which side you agree with more: supporters or opponents.

Q38. • Supporters of more transparency in higher education say it would shed light on underperforming programs that don't lead to good jobs, improve the ability of students to repay their loans, and improve the return on investment students get from college.

• Opponents of more transparency in higher education say it would invade students' privacy by allowing the government to collect personal data on students and create unnecessary burdens for colleges and universities.

Q39. • Supporters of public service loan forgiveness say the government should encourage people to enter vital but sometimes lower-paying professions like the military, law enforcement, and public education. • Opponents of public service loan forgiveness say that students who borrow to attend college should have the responsibility to pay back their student loans on their own, no matter what job they choose after graduation.
